Working with LTBM was one of the most beautiful, yet heart-wrenching experiences. Paul and I had to look into the future and visualize each of our children's milestones. We realized our reality was that Paul would not be present to experience those joyful moments with the kids and me. This wasn't us giving up hope that Paul could be cured, but this was us creating an insurance of gifts so that Paul could always share in these milestones no matter the outcome of his cancer.

Participating restaurants will donate 20% of their total sales from the ENTIRE day on Thursday, October 21, to Let There Be Mom.

*Let There Be Mom, or Dad in our case, was introduced to my family in 2016. My husband Paul had stage IV melanoma skin cancer. The founder of LTBM came to our home to speak with us about setting up legacy gifts for our son and daughter.*

As we walked us through all the milestones we should consider in each of our children's lives, here is what I was thinking.

“Wow! This is such a special, and needed program. It would be so amazing to have all of these gifts prepared and ready for me to give to my kids in the future on behalf of Paul should he die, but with all the medical bills coming in, there is no way we could afford to pay for this program.”

When I asked what the cost would be, I was told there would be no cost to us. She explained that through generous donors, business donations, and fundraisers like “Dine Out For Mom”, all of the prepared gifts would be given to our children free of charge.

Sadly, Paul passed away in December of 2018. We miss him every day. Yet, he was with us in spirit when my daughter turned 13 and she received a bracelet that had charms to represents the sweet relationship she and her dad shared. Paul was with us in spirit when my son who turned 16 a couple months ago, received a wallet made from his favorite leather Rainbow sandals that he wore all the time. It was so difficult not having Paul present at their birthdays, but the kids were so happy to receive a gift from their dad. There are many more gifts that my children will receive in the future from their dad.

We are so grateful for LTBM. Please consider supporting and donating to this amazing nonprofit organization, and know that your monetary gift will continue to give to children who have lost a parent for years to come.

Thank you, Traci, Stephen and Grace Daniel
